Presents

Creating Supports Where None Are Built In

We all know them. Those women with the husbands, grandparents, and extended family who are nearby and available to help out when the school calls with the news that their child is sick ten minutes before a deposition is scheduled to begin.

But here you are – the single mom, the mom whose husband is out of town, the mom who recently moved here and has no supports in place. How do you manage those day-to-day bombshells that kids throw into your career?

Whether you have strategies to share (car-pooling, networking with the families of your child's peers, remote office access), or are looking to learn new ones, please join us as we discuss another facet of balancing a career in the law with motherhood.
